Summary of findings

Overall summary

Parkside is a residential home providing accommodation for up to 31 older adults and people living with dementia. There were six people in residence when we inspected.

We found the following examples of good practice.

The provider had good procedures for preventing visitors from catching or spreading infection. End of life visits had taken place so that a family member could sit with their relative. New 'hand-hold' visits were well underway with relatives being able to visit after taking a Covid-19 test and staff provided them with PPE.

The staff could support people to access Face time or Skype to contact families and friends. Families could talk with staff by phone. Consultations with health care professionals were done virtually and the staff told us the community nurses visited and were very supported to them and to people in the home. Staff told us they had time to support people and to provide suitable activities and entertainments. This included virtual tours and DVDs of days gone by. Staff and people in the home were looking at ways to improve the outside spaces.

The staff team had supported people to isolate during the outbreak of Covid-19 and people had understood the reasons for isolating. People had now recovered from the virus. One person was isolating as they had returned from a hospital stay. Good arrangements were in place so that people kept a safe distance in shared areas. People living with dementia were guided and supported to socially distance as much as possible. There had been no admissions to the home for some time, but any new admission would be after a negative test result and people would be supported to isolate in their rooms for the recommended period of time.

The staff and the people who lived in the home had been tested routinely. Those who had a negative test continued to be tested. Staff and service users had all received the Covid -19 vaccine. In some instances they had received a second vaccine.

The home was very clean and hygienic. The staff followed national and local guidance during the outbreak and rigorous systems were in place to ensure good levels of hygiene. There were cleaning schedules and other systems to ensure good infection prevention and control measures. Staff understood how to use and dispose of personal protective equipment.

We met with staff who were very positive about their work and told us the welfare of people in the home was very important to them. They acknowledged the trauma of dealing with an outbreak but said that they worked well as a team and could talk to management and to each other. Arrangements had been put in place to ensure the staff could return to work safely. For example, some staff did not deliver direct care because they were in a high risk category. Staff told us that the past year had been difficult but they had tried their best to be positive because "We are here for the residents and their care is the most important thing." Staff told us they could access confidential counselling if they were experiencing difficulties. Good risk management was in place for service users and staff from ethnic minorities or who had underlying issues that would reduce their risk of serious illness.
